

Arnaldo De La Cruz

Which type of ideas do you think apply to Shyp? Why?

I think that Shyp is most similar to a “Simplify” and “Virtualize” business idea. Shyp simplifies the process of buying, packing, and mailing items by removing that labor from the consumer and instead only requiring them to take a photo of their desired item and submitting the location. This also falls under virtualizing as it creates an app that does all these “in-person things” all through their business.

Which type of ideas do you think apply to Curofy? Why?

I think that this business idea is a great example of “simplify” and “me too” ideas. This new website serves as a simplified way of connecting with other healthcare professionals and as a “me too” idea since it uses an established idea like linkedin to create a more focused version for professional communication and connection platform that is exclusive to healthcare professionals.

LingoLingo:

The startup that I chose is an educational language software that combines YouTube videos with language learning exercises to teach different languages. I think this is a great example of “Simplify”, “Me Too”, and “Visualizing”. The app puts videos, translations, and exercises all into one place for the user’s convenience. It creates an app similar to “TikTok” for a different demographic and makes the short/long form content educational. I think that this is a definite vitamin, but in some cases qualifies as a painkiller. I say this because usually learning another language is a desire and not a necessity. It can be a hobby or interest of some people but is not a necessity in their life. However, it might become a painkiller if the consumer is in need of learning another language, whether it is for their job or some type of classwork. I would say this type of product can be monetized pretty easily with the use of ads and commercials that could come on during the usage. I would say it is personally relevant as I actually was considering picking up learning languages as a hobby. I think the idea definitely has the potential to have a huge market with the large amounts of languages spoken not just in the United States but internationally as well.

BRAINSTORMING:

Language Learning Application:

- Provide educational resources and videos
- Quiz on the knowledge at certain points
- Have a ranking system on how the progress is going

TV Show Rating Application:

- Have a constantly updating catalog of TV Shows
- Allow for user profiles and ratings
- Allow people to leave comments and create rankings

The idea that I chose to go forward with is the TV show rating application. I chose this idea since I really enjoy watching TV shows and like critiquing them. This is an idea that already exists in a sense. There are tons of rating websites like IMDb and RottenTomatoes but not truly focused on the user instead of the shows themselves. The most similar is “Letterboxd” but that application mostly pertains to movies. This would definitely be an entertainment related application.

Product Proposal

The product I have come up with is a “social media like” website that hosts a large, expanding catalog of TV Shows that allow the users to create their own profiles in which they can view ratings, leave ratings, add comments, are given recommendations based on their recent watches, and they can personalize their profiles to recommend shows to others. I love watching both shows and movies and think that this idea would be very intriguing to people who are just as interested in shows as I am. The product gives a place for people to express themselves in a space designated for this certain topic. It is definitely a vitamin and there is no real necessity being fulfilled by this product, instead it provides to the wants and hobbies of people. The website could monetize their ads and have certain perks put behind paywalls for exclusive members. My product is easily described as a social media like website that allows fans to research, rate, review, and recommend television shows. I think that the best secret sauce of this idea is the drive of the enthusiasts of television shows. The creation of a similar product that was geared towards movies and definitely successful, and now people can look for one that does the same for television shows.